Every one knows that Uncle Same is engaged in various phases of business in order to carry out his main purpose, which is the proper conduct of the government of over sixty millions of people. Perhaps the average citizen does not realize, even those who are mors or less familiar with Washington, that at the nation's capital there is a large establishment controlled entirely by Uncle Sam, which is devoted to purely industrial purposes. It is the shop where the mail bags used in the postal service are repaired. Some idea of the magnitude of this business can be gathered from the fact that the building occupied for this purpose is a large five story structure, where over 230 persons are enployed.

AN INTERVENTION.

Guido certainly looked perfectly happy. Indeed any one would have my family, and found it a'l that you thought that he had not a care in represented it to be. My children all the world. He was on his way home know its value and call for it daily from a political banquet, where he for their many pains, cuts and bruises. had been explaining in detail his I could not part with mine under any programme to his electors. He had been complimented on all sides, and added to this the dinner itself had been excellent and the champagne all that could be desired. Guido felt quite easy in his own mind about the result of the election, and now where he would enjoy a flirtation with the Baroness Stefania. He was just returning home now to have an hour's rest and a nap, like Napoleon on the eve of a battle. On entering the dining room his faithful old servant, Giuseppe, followed him respectfully in and stood for a minute, evidently desiring to speak to his

'I am going to my room to get a little rest," he said to Giuseppe You can wake me at 8." "You'd better not, sir," said the

"And why not, pray?" "Because, sir, when Girolamo was here alone this morning a lady called, and when she found that you were out she said, 'Tell your master when he comes in that I will call again at 7 and ask him to be sure to wait line and no excuse for staying at for me, as I want to see him on particular business.

"And her name?" 'She would not give it."

"H-m! More and more myste rious. Did Girolamo say what she was like?' "Yes. She was young, tall, dark and very well dressed.

"Oh! It's getting decidedly interesting, and I feel curious. And you think, then, Giuseppe, for the sake of this unknown lady, I ought to forego my nap?"

'Well, it's just 7 o'clock, sir. she is anything like punctual, you wouldn't have time to lie down before she is here."

"Oh, well. I will make the sacri fice. Get my newspaper, Giuseppe, and I'll read till she arrives. Dark The Baroness Stefania is fair. Nothing like a change," murmured Guido to himself when the old man had gone out of the room.

It certainly sounds very much as though the young politician were a veritable Don Juan, but in reality he was nothing of the kind. Guido had had a great disappointment in his life. He had loved one woman passionately and devotedly, but his happiness had been suddenly snatch. ed away from him, and the love still smoldered in his heart, half smoth. ered and stifled as it had been. For the last two years Guido had been striving to forget, and he had thrown himself headlong into all the gayeties and diversions of society life. "If you please, sir," exclaimed Giuseppe, re-entering the dining room hastily.

"Has she arrived?" "She is in the drawing room."

"Do you know her?" "No-no, sir," stammered the old

Guido was soon in the drawing room. He opened the door quietly and stood for a few seconds contemplating his visitor. She was standing near a table, turning over the leaves of an album. Her back was turned toward the door, but Guido could see that she was tall and graceful. She wore a very handsome silk dress and was decidedly elegant.

"Madame," said Guido, advanc ing toward her.

She turned suddenly, and her host felt as though he had received an electric shock. He bowed, however, profoundly in order to hide the surprise on his face.

"I am not inconveniencing you by coming this evening?" she asked after returning his bow, and then she sat down very deliberately. "Certainly not. I am entirely at your service. "If you say that merely out of politeness, so much the worse for you, as I should like to take it literally. "Do so, by all means. I take upon myself all risk and shall be glad to hear what you have to say," answered Guido, smiling. The lady, whose name was Emma, stroked her muff, evidently hesitating as to how she was going to express what she had to say.

"Have you ever taken part in comedy?" she asked at length. "Oh, yes. I am still acting in one that never comes to an end."

"My question was needless, I see. Tomorrow, then, I want you to continue, that is all. But you will have cir'it yours to him every day and an important role to take, and it will be difficult to succeed."

"I would not have my father, upon any account, know the truth. "The wretched truth," interrupt ed Guido. "It is no use putting adjectives in everywhere. He must see us together when he comes tomorrow, and we must not betray, either by word or look, the true situation. This is what we must do.' Emma had spoken earnestly and firmly, and Guido had listened attentively. He was silent for a moment when she stopped speaking, and she began again impatiently: "It is merely a comedy, as I told you at first, a play given for a charitable purpose. It ought not to cost you so much. "Oh, I am quite ready and willafraid that something may go wrong and compromise everything?" "In what way?" "Well, there are the servants." "Send your new valet out tomorrow for a day's holiday, and then I

"But"-"Oh, you have perhaps had some alterations made in other rooms?" "No, nothing has been altered," said Guido, speaking very seriously.

Everything is as you left it.' "By way of sentiment?" "It was out of respect."

"A thousand thanks. Have you any other objections?" "None whatever. The great thing is now whether we shall succeed in deceiving M. Giorgianni. "By acting a sentimental couple!

At the ball he was most absentminded, and the Baroness Stefania did not know what to make of him. After two or three dances he man aged during a quadrille to slip away unobserved, and on returning home he found that a complete transformation had taken place. The large drawing room, which had not been used for some time, was open, and candles were lighted everywhere. The wardrobes and cupboards; too, were all open, and there was a scent of violets. A copy of one of the newest songs was on the piano, the > very calmly, without her voice trembling in the least, she announced to him that she had decided it would be better for them to separate quietly without any fuss or any scene. Guido was stupefied. At first he protested and then tried to take it all as a joke and wanted to explain matters to her, but his wife answered so coldly and proudly that there was nothing left for him but to maintain a frigid silence. It seemed to him that it was beneath his dignity to plead his cause, and so he merely agreed to all her conditions and let her go, judging her to be both proud and heartless.

One day, however, it happened that Guido chanced to meet a girl whom he had formerly very much admired, and with whom he had in the old days fancied himself deeply in love. Somehow or other Emma had got wind of this and reproached him with never having told her. still write regularly to my father?' Guido, angry at being dictated to and also at his wife's want of confidence, put on a careless, indifferent manner.

Emma had withdrawn from socie ty, so her husband was sure never to meet her at the balls and theaters, where he now spent the greater part of his spare time. They had before separating agreed on one point, and that was to continue writing to the old father as though nothing had happened.

Guido used to put in his letters: Emma is well, but I suppose she has given you all the news about herself. She sends her love," etc., and then Emma wrote in her letter "Guido is very well, but very busy. He was not able to get off in order to stay with me at the sea." And so M. Giorgianni's happines had gone on hanging by the fragile ing," said Guido, but are you not silken thread. To meet and speak to each other then thus for the first time after that supremely cruel day of their separation had been no easy matter for either of them.

> Dinner was just over, and Signor Giorgianni was smiling, for he felt so happy-he had had such a hearty reception, and everything seemed so very satisfactory.

The two actors managed to get up a smile also, but the fact was all that had appeared so easy to them the night before had proved very difficult when it came to the point. For instance, when Emma's father had arrived, he had put his arms round both of them as he had kissed his feel awkward for a moment. The worst was to come, however. for no sooner had M. Giorgianni taken an armchair comfortably in the drawing room than he began asking all kinds of embarrassing questions and making remarks which were not calculated to put the young husband and wife at their ease, considering the circumstances. Suddenly M. Giorgianni said: "Come, my children, I want to go all through the house and see everything. There seems to me to be plenty of silk and velvet every-I want to see everything

"It's magnificent, this room," said M. Giorgianni on entering. "Just we do just now." "Yes, yes; I understand. Your business affairs and your political engagements must take up your time a great deal, but it's a lovely room. Ah, and this is the boudoir.

Exquisite taste, to be sure. Did you choose the furniture, Emma?" "No. It was Guido who chose it." "Well, my compliments, then," said the father, turning to his sonin-law. "I suppose you are always to be found here, Emma? Are you not afraid of every one coming to

"I know my husband too well, papa."

Both these answers had been given so spontaneously that M. Giorgianni was quite satisfied.

They went back into the drawing room and sat down. Both husband and wife were very absentminded, and certainly if Signor Giorgianni had been endowed with much perspicacity he would have discovered that something was wrong. Fortu nately the excellent old man was not good at guessing enigmas.

"What a pity for you to leave such beautiful house!

'Why, papa?" "Well, if Guido should be elected member, why, you will have to live in Rome six months of the year, and suppose he won't leave you alone in Milan. You will have to have two houses. It will be a nuisance for you, but I shan't be sorry. If you come to Rome, I shall be able to see you at least once a month. From Naples to Rome, it is quite a short, easy journey, while from Naples to Milan-no, that is too far, too far often then.' When our two actors, after conducting Signer Giorgianni to the station, got into the carriage to drive home, they both involuntarily gave

The comedy was over, and they were going back again to their ordi nary lives. Emma looked out of the window at the rain, and Guido did not stir. They were strangers again to each other now. By accident Guido touched his wife's arm.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "Granted," she replied carelessly. Strangers indeed! And yet they were now both of them going over in their minds the events of the day and recalling to themselves the sen sations they had felt. "Would you prefer driving straight to your house?" asked Gui do just before they reached the place where their roads separated. "No. I must go and help my maid to collect all the little things I put about your rooms. I will go home as soon as we have finished.'

"Very well." When they arrived, Emma went straight up stairs and through the large drawing room to her boudoir Guido threw himself on a divan in the drawing room and pretended to be reading a newspaper. In reality he was listening to her footsteps as she moved slowly about in the other room. He saw her pass the eper door once or twice.

"Are you not tired?" he called out at last. "Can I help you?" "No, thank you. I have almost

He had risen from his seat, and his face was deadly pale.

"Goodby," said Emma. Guido did not reply. She turned away and walked across the drawing room proudly without wavering an instant, her step firm, but she knew that her husband was following her. When she reached the door, she lifted her hand to raise the velvet curtain, but Guido was more prompt and her hand touched his as he held the curtain down. "You have forgotten to tell me that you have forgiven me, Emma,' he said very quietly in a voice in which grief and passion were each

"Oh, well. I will make the sacrifice. Get my newspaper, Giuseppe, and I'll read till she arrives. Dark! The Baroness Stefania is fair. Nothing like a change," murmured Guido gone out of the room.

It certainly sounds very much as though the young politician were a veritable Don Juan, but in reality he was nothing of the kind. Guido had had a great disappointment in his life He had loved one woman passionately and devotedly, but his happiness had been suddenly snatched away from him, and the love still smoldered in his heart, half smothered and stifled as it had been. For the last two years Guido had been striving to forget, and he had thrown himself headlong into all the gaye

ties and diversions of society life. "If you please, sir," exclaimed Giuseppe, re-entering the dining

"Has she arrived?" 'She is in the drawing room.' "Do you know her?"

'No-no, sir," stammered the old Guido was soon in the drawing room. He opened the door quietly and stood for a few seconds contemplating his visitor. She was stand ing near a table, turning over the leaves of an album. Her back was turned toward the door, but Guido could see that she was tall and graceful. She wore a very handsome silk dress and was decidedly "Madame," said Guido, advancing toward her.

She turned suddenly, and her host felt as though he had received an electric shock. He bowed, however, profoundly in order to hide the surprise on his face.

"I am not inconveniencing you by coming this evening?" she asked after returning his bow, and then she sat down very deliberately. "Certainly not. I am entirely at

"Good night," said Guido as he passed through the room. 'Good night," she replied without turning round.

And yet before their marriage they had been so foolishly in love with each other. Guido had followed Emma from Florence to Naples and had passed whole nights under her window. Emma had written letters of tinue, that is all. But you will have eight pages to him every day and > young couple had been blissfully happy and devotedly in love with each other for three years.

One day, however, it happened that Guido chanced to meet a girl whom he had formerly very much admired, and with whom he had in the old days fancied himself deeply in love. Somehow or other Emma had got wind of this and reproached him with never having told her. Guido, angry at being diotated to and also at his wife's want of confidence, put on a careless, indifferent very calmly, without her voice trembling in the least, she announced to him that she had decided it would be better for them to separate quietly without any fuss or any scene. Guido was stupefied. At first he protested and then tried to take it all as a joke and wanted to explain matters to her, but his wife answered so coldly and proudly that there was nothing left for him but to maintain a frigid silence. It seemed to him that it was beneath his dignity to plead 'is cause, and so La merely agreed to all her conditions and let her go, judging her to be both proud and heartless.

Emma had withdrawn from socie y, so her husband was sure never to meet her at the balls and theaters, where he now spent the greater part of his spare time. They had before separating agreed on one point, and that was to continue writing to the old father as though nothing had happened.

Guido used to put in his letters: 'Emma is well, but I suppose she has given you all the news about herself. She sends her love," etc., and then Emma wrote in her letter: "Guido is very well, but very busy. you at first, a play given for a He was not able to get off in order to stay with me at the sea.

And so M. Giorgianni's happine had gone on hanging by the fragile silken thread. To meet and speak to each other then thus for the first time after that supremely cruel day of their separation had been no easy matter for either of them.

Dinner was just over, and Signor Giorgianni was smiling, for he felt so happy-he had had such a hearty reception, and everything seemed so very satisfactory.

The two actors managed to get up a smile also, but the fact was all that had appeared so easy to them the night before had proved very diffi-night before had proved very diffi-asked Guido, for he had put his painstance, when Emma's father had arrived, he had put his arms round both of them as he had kissed his daughter.

Then they had been obliged to call each other by their old familiar pe names and to show those little at tentions to each other which com quite naturally to a husband and wife who adore each other, as the were supposed to do, and all the time a word or an intonation of the voice which recalled the past would make Guido turn pale with emotion and would bring the color into Em ma's cheeks and make them both feel awkward for a moment. The worst was to come, however for no sooner had M. Giorgiann taken an armchair comfortably in the drawing room than he began asking all kinds of embarrassing questions and making remarks which were not calculated to put the young husband and wife at their ease, considering the circumstances Suddenly M. Giorgianni said: "Come, my children, I want to g all through the house and see every thing. There seems to me to b plenty of silk and velvet every Both these answers had been given so spontaneously that M. Giorgianni was quite satisfied. They went back into the drawing room and sat down. Both husbane and wife were very absentminded and certainly if Signor Giorgianni had been endowed with much per spicacity he would have discovered that something was wrong. Fortunately the excellent old man was not The good at guessing enigmas.

ducting Signor Giorgianni to the station, got into the carriage to drive home, they both involuntarily gave a sigh of relief.

The comedy was over, and they were going back again to their ordinary lives. Emma looked out of the window at the rain, and Guido did not stir. They were strangers again to each other now. By accident Guido touched his wife's arm. "I beg your pardon," he said.

"Granted," she replied carelessly Strangers indeed! And yet they were now both of them going over in their minds the events of the day and recalling to themselves the sen sations they had felt. "Would you prefer driving

When they arrived, Emma went straight up stairs and through the large drawing room to her boudoir Guido threw himself on a divan in the drawing room and pretended to be reading a newspaper. She turned toward him abruptly and hid her face on his shoulder, for the old love had sprung up again between them with a stronger force than ever.

"You will never go away any ore, darling, never?" "No, Guido. We will fetch my other's picture back here."-From the Italian in Strand Magazine.
